Teaching European History in the 21st Century

Teaching European History in the 21st Century (TEH21) brings together European history experts from Germany, Spain, Czech Republic, Hungary, the United Kingdom, France, and the Netherlands.

The TEH21 project aims to collaboratively develop English-language teaching material for courses in early modern, modern and contemporary European history that allows universities to internationalise their curriculum and reflect the range and multi-perspectivity of European history.

The project will produce:

An open access textbook

Online introductory lectures for each textbook chapter

Online collection of primary sources in the original language and English translations

A best-practice guide for the international classroom

TEH21

Teaching European History in the 21st Century

Through the increasing globalisation of the higher education sector, the demand for English-language courses has risen at universities all over Europe. However, history departments wanting to internationalise their curricula often depend on teaching material that does not reflect the range and multi-perspectivity of European history. TEH21 aims to change this.

TEH21 will result in innovative teaching material based on textual, visual and audiovisual sources produced by international author teams.

The project runs over three years (2019-2022) and is funded by the European Commission under the Erasmus+ Key Action 2 (Cooperation for innovation and the exchange of good practices).
